JUDGE JUDITH SHEINDLIN

Judge Judith Sheindlin's career in family court began in 1972 when she began prosecuting juvenile delinquency cases for the state of New York, quickly developing a reputation as a sharp, no-nonsense lawyer. In 1982, New York's then-Mayor, Edward Koch, appointed Judge Sheindlin to the bench as a Judge in the Family Court. Four years later, she was appointed the Supervising Judge in Manhattan and since then, has heard over 20,000 cases in her career. Judge Sheindlin earned a reputation as one of New York's toughest judges.

As one of the most outspoken judges in the country, Judge Sheindlin became the subject of a Los Angeles Times article in February of 1993. The piece caught the attention of 60 Minutes, leading to a segment on the popular newsmagazine show, which brought her national recognition. She was approached by Larry Lyttle, President, Big Ticket Television, about the possibility of presiding over real cases with real consequences in a courtroom on television. Intrigued by the notion of bringing her no-nonsense message to a national audience, she agreed. Shortly thereafter, JUDGE JUDY became a reality, premiering in national syndication on September 16, 1996.
